"Too Late for Repentance" the Last Book Nellie Brod Read.

ENDS WRETCHED LIFE.

Companion Called Help After Tragedy in Flat and Quickly Disappeared.

"Too Late for Repentance," by Bertha M. Clay, was the last book Nellie Brod Possibly the reading of it did not drive her to suicide, but the title aptly expresses what she thought of hersel after three years of life in the Tender-Roy Miller, with whom she lived at No. 130 East Forty-third street, and who was with her when she shot herself yesterday morning, is a fugitive. Policemen searching for him would like to entertain him for about five minutes in the back room of a station-house. Back in the little mining town of Lattimer, Pa., Nellie Brod heard the call of the Tenderloin in the summer of 1902. Blie was a strong, healthy, handsome girl the day she bought her ticket at Wilkes-Barre for her excursion to the vague, unknown territory she had heard described. The autopsy held today discloses that in shooting herself she hastened her end by only a few months, for she was a consumptive. Other autopsy disclosures told of months of misery and pain.

Known in Many Dives.

In the course of her Tenderloin career Nellie Brod had meny names. Her face was familiar in all the dives west of Broadway from Forty-second street down to Twenty-ninth. Her last name was "Lottie Miller." taken from the fugitive Roy Miller. They were known es husband and wife in the Forty-third street flat house, where they had two rooms in'the rear.

Miller was a telephone operator at the Hotel Manhattan. His salary was $32.50 month. The rent of the two rooms he occupied with the girl was $8.50 a week He dressed well. Trunks he left behind are stocked with expensive apparel. When Nellie Brod died she did not have a stitch of winter clothing. The thin shoes she wore Saturday night trudging through the rain, skulking and dodging through side streets and around corners *in the Tenderiqin, were so thoroughly soaked that the Morgue attendants had difficulty in removing them from her feet when her body was delivered to

From all the information the police can gather. Nellie Brod reached the place she called home about 3 o'clock few minutes before. No o e in the house heard the shot, but Horace Hedden, a travelling salesman, in an adjoining apartment, was awakened shortly before 4 o'clock by some one knocking on his door. It was Miller, fully dressed.

Hedden stepped across the hall into the Miller apartment. The girl was on the floor by a table, attired in her street clothes. She was clutching at her left side with both hands. Her eyes were closed, her face was twisted in agony. A pistol lay on the floor at her agony. A pistol lay on the floor at her side. All the circumstances pointed to suicide, which, according to acquaintances, she often had threatened. "Tell this man you shot yourself!" should Miller. "They'll try to put it up to me. Tell him you shot yourself." The girl didn't hear him. Hedden ran out to get a doctor. When he returned with the doctor and a policeman Miller had disappeared.

The effects of the dead girl are at the East Fifty-first street station. She had about five hundred letters from men in all parts of the United States. Memorandum books in her trunks contained thousands of addresses. The only Richard in the apartment was on the order of the book she read before she sich hersolf.

WANAMAKER'S Is to Which All Traffic Rivers Flow

As rivers follow the lines of least resistance in winding their way to the ocean, so New York's millions of holiday shoppers follow the easy course of travel to Astor Place—to Wanamaker's—the transit centre of Greater New York. Last Friday and Saturday were recordbreaking days for this old Stewart Store. How we longed for the ample spaces of the New Wanamaker Building in which to welcome the thousands of enthusiastic shoppers, as well as to properly display the magnificent and extraordinary stocks gathered here in anticipation of having the new building in which to show them.

One more season this old Stewart Building holds the exclusive honor of serving you, and it presents the most remarkable arrays of fine merchandise any building in the land ever held. Take the SUBWAY, and you will be in WANAMAKER'S when the train stops. There will be no rainy days, no blizzards, no snowy or muddy streets to bother with, in coming to WANAMAKER'S. It is the easy and comfortable store to get to, in any weather, the satisfying store to shop in, under all circumstances.

An Extraordinary Pre-Christmas Sale Of Finest CUT GLASS $50,000 Worth, at Little More Than Half Price

Better news for the gift-buying season could scarcely be written; and better Cut Glass than this is not made; and greater variety of exactly the pieces wanted for gifts was never presented anywhere.

That is the kernel of one of the best pieces of merchandising that has ever been credto this Store, of no small fame.

The manufacturer of this Cut Glass is the dean of the Corning guild—one of the oldest concerns in the craft, and today counted the best. Everybody knows that enough glass to meet holiday demands cannot be made after orders are taken. They must be anticipated. This factory over-did it. A surplus of Fifty Thousand Dollars' worth was on band. The two Wanamaker Stores, in New York and Philadelphia, undertook the enormous distribution, Not a piece was cut for "sale" purposes. All was regular stock, expecting to bring regular prices. The variety includes everything the most artistic and original factory in the business made. There are twice as many shapes in pitchers, for instance, as the best store in the country regularly shows—same in vases, bowls, ice cream trays and the rest, The newest and choicest shapes and cuttings-and nothing else-

Yet Every Piece Is Worth a Half More Than Today's Price And many show still greater valuations. It's the best Christmas news printed or read this season. Impossible to list a stock so varied; but here is suggestion;
